1. a. The quenching, putting out (of fire, light, anything burning or shining; fig. hopes, passions, life, etc.); the fact of being quenched; the process of becoming, or the condition of being, extinct.

c. Physics. Reduction in the intensity of radiation. (i) Reduction in the intensity of a beam of light as a result of absorption and scattering as it passes through a medium.

1794 G. ADAMS Nat. & Exp. Philos. II. xxi. 406 Reflexion, refraction, and extinction, are affections of light by transparent bodies. 1827-8 J. F. W. HERSCHEL in Encycl. Metrop. (1845) IV. 431 The extinction of a beam of homogeneous light in passing through a homogeneous medium. 1957 H. C. VAN DE HULST Light Scattering by Small Particles xviii. 388 Extinction can be measured by observing the intensity..of a light source as seen through a container with scattering particles. 1963 J. M. STONE Radiation & Optics xiv. 335 Extinction is accounted for partly as scattering and partly as absorption. Extinction may..consist entirely of absorption (for example, in an opaque screen of negligible reflectance) or almost entirely of scattering (for example, from..a very thick cloud in the sky).

(ii) The state or condition of darkness in a crystal placed in polarized light between crossed nicols. Hence angle of extinction, the angle formed, on rotation, between the position of extinction of a ray of light and a principal crystallographic direction. Also attrib.

1873 J. TYNDALL Six Lectures on Light iv. 133 This brings us at once to the part played by the analyzer, the sole function of which is to recompound the two vibrations emergent from the gypsum. It reduces them to a single plane, where, if one of them be retarded by the proper amount, extinction will occur. 1912 R. W. CLARK tr. Weinschenk's Petrogr. Meth. 67 Maximum brightness is obtained when the vibration directions of the crystal are at 45° to those of the nicols. It diminishes upon further rotation and passes gradually over into complete darkness when these directions are respectively parallel. This latter position is also called the position of extinction, and the vibration directions in the crystal, the extinction directions. Ibid. 70 Extinction Curve for Diopside. Ibid., In triclinic minerals the determination of the extinction angles is of value only when the orientation of the face upon which they are observed is accurately known. 1921 A. HOLMES Petrogr. Meth. 126 When a transparent mineral fragment is rotated between crossed nicols various phenomena may be observed... If the object remains dark, and is therefore isotropic, the total extinction indicates an amorphous or cubic (isometric) mineral in an unstrained condition, or a basal section of a uniaxial mineral (tetragonal, hexagonal, or trigonal). 1937 Discovery Sept. 283/2 A complete record of the colour variation and the angles of extinction can be permanently obtained.

(iii) A reduction in the intensity of X-rays diffracted by a crystal owing to interference between the incident beam and beams multiply diffracted by the lattice planes (primary extinction) and to the progressive weakening of the incident beam in its passage through the crystal as energy is diverted into the diffracted beams (secondary extinction).

1914 C. G. DARWIN in Phil. Mag. 6th Ser. XXVII. 681 The extinction is complete long before the [X-]rays going in a slightly different direction are appreciably absorbed. This fact is important in explaining the reflexion from an ordinary imperfect crystal. 1922 —— in Ibid. XLIII. 804 The extinction itself..exerts two effects, which may be called primary and secondary. 1934 W. P. DAVEY Study Crystal Struct. x. 308 The cleavage faces of all actual single crystals are perfect enough to show a little primary extinction and are imperfect enough to show a great deal of secondary extinction. 1948 K. LONSDALE Crystals & X-Rays vi. 140 The effect of this primary extinction..is an enormous apparent increase in absorption, over a very restricted range of angle. 1966 D. G. BRANDON Mod. Techniques Metallogr. 83 Crystal imperfections will prevent double diffraction and hence prevent extinction, leading to an increased diffracted intensity in regions of lattice strain.

‖extra ('ɛkstrə), prep. rare. [L. extrā (earlier extrād) outside (adv. and prep.), contracted form of exterā(d), abl. fem. of exter (see EXTERIOR) in phrase exterā parte on the outer side.] Outside, externally to.

1852 W. GROVE in Phil. Trans. CXLII. 87 There was some effect exhibited extra the voltaic circuit.

extra- ('ɛkstrə), prefix. The L. adv. and prep. extrā (see prec.) does not, strictly speaking, occur in composition during the classical period, though post-classically it formed a few vbs. like extrāclūdĕre to shut out, extrāvagārī to wander outside (whence extravagant). Classical L. had however the adj. extraordinārius EXTRAORDINARY, f. phrase extrā ordinem outside the regular order, and late L. also extrāmundānus EXTRAMUNDANE, f. phrase extrā mundum, extrāmūrānus (cf. EXTRAMURAL) f. extrā mūrum (or mūrōs), extrānātūrālis 'extra-natural', f. extrā nātūrām. Many similar adjs. were formed in med.L. on phrases in which extrā is a prep., and some of these are adopted in Eng., as extra-provincial. As the suffix employed in such formations was nearly always identical with that used to form an adj. from the sb. governed by extra, the words have the appearance of being f. extra- + adj. (the actual formation, on extra prep. + sb. + suffix, being obscured); thus extraordinary is felt as meaning 'outside of what is ordinary'. In recent times an enormous number of adjs. of this type have been formed. The most important compounds of extra-, and those requiring etymological explanation, are given in their alphabetical place; of the remainder only a selection can be given in the following lists, many nonce-words of obvious meaning being omitted.

extreme (ɛk'stri:m), a., adv., and sb. Forms: 5–7 extream(e, (6 extreeme), 5– extreme. [a. OF. extreme (F. extrême), ad. L. extrēmus, superl. of exterus outward (see EXTERIOR).

The L. extrēmus, like Eng. utmost, is scarcely to be found used in its strictly literal sense of 'outermost'; the ordinary senses are 'endmost', 'farthest', 'last'; and, with loss of the distinctively superlative signification, 'very far advanced', 'excessive in degree'. In late L. the adj. was treated as a positive, with compar. and superl. degrees extrēmior, extrēmissimus. In Eng. extremer, extremest, and more freq. more, most extreme, are occasionally used, and (although condemned by Johnson) are justifiable on the ground that the adj. is not always equivalent to a superlative. In some instances the superlative form may be really pleonastic as in chiefest.]

F

F (ɛf), the sixth letter of the Roman alphabet, represents historically the 6th letter (waw) of the Semitic alphabet, which expressed the sounds of w (approximately) and the related vowel u. In early Greek writing the letter had at first the same twofold power; but subsequently its accidental varieties of form came to be differentiated in function, the form F (retaining the 6th place in the alphabet) being appropriated to the consonantal use, while V or Y served for the vowel, and is the source of the Roman U, V, Y, as explained under those letters. As the sound w was lost in the chief literary Greek dialects of the classical period, its sign F (called by the grammarians from its form the DIGAMMA) is not included in the later Gr. alphabet. In the Roman adoption of the Gr. alphabet the sound given to the 6th letter was the voiceless labiodental spirant (f). In OE. the letter retained the sound (f) unless it stood between two vowels, when it was pronounced as the corresponding voiced spirant (v). In the S.W., according to some scholars, the voiced sound was used also initially. In mod. Eng. F is always sounded (f), exc. in the word of, where it is voiced to (v) through absence of stress.

In MSS. a capital F was often written as ff. A misunderstanding of this practice has caused the writing of Ff or ff at the beginning of certain family names, e.g. Ffiennes, Ffoulkes.

fade (feɪd), a.[2] Also 3 vad, 5 faed. [a. F. fade vapid, insipid, dull, faded; according to M. Gaston Paris (Mém. de la Soc. de Ling. I. 90) repr. L. vapidum (see VAPID); cf. OF. rade:—L. rapidum, maussade:—L. male sapidum.

The great difficulty is the anomalous representation of L. v by f; the apparent parallel in OF. feiz (mod. fois):—vicem is questionable, the f in that case being prob. due to sentence-combination. The ordinary view that fade descends from L. fatuum foolish, also insipid (whence Pr. fatz fem. fade, in same senses), is inadmissible on phonological grounds; but it is possible that early confusion with this word may have given rise to the change of v into f. No OF. vade* has been found: if it existed it would explain the Eng. vade, var. of FADE v., which is otherwise difficult to account for, as the Eng. dialects that have v for f usually retain f in Romanic words. Cf. Fr. dial. (Lyons) vadou (fem. vadoussi), repr. L. type vapidōsum*.]

The L. fides, like its etymological cognate Gr. πίστις, which it renders in the N.T., had the following principal senses: 1. Belief, trust. 2. That which produces belief, evidence, token, pledge, engagement. 3. Trust in its objective aspect, troth; observance of trust, fidelity.]

I. Belief, trust, confidence.

1. a. Confidence, reliance, trust (in the ability, goodness, etc., of a person; in the efficacy or worth of a thing; or in the truth of a statement or doctrine). Const. in, †of. In early use, only with reference to religious objects; this is still the prevalent application, and often colours the wider use.

By Christian writers often identified with the preceding; but not exclusively confined to Christian use. fake (feik), v.[2] slang. [Of obscure origin. There appears to be some ground for regarding it as a variant of the older FEAK, FEAGUE, which are prob. ad. Ger. fegen (or the equivalent Du. or LG.) to furbish up, clean, sweep.

In Rowland's Martin Mark-all 1610, *a feager of loge*s is explained as meaning 'one who begs with false documents' (cf. to fake a screever, and the modern fake away appear to correspond to the earlier feague it away. The colloquial and jocular uses of the Ger. fegen closely resemble the senses mentioned in quot. 1812: amongst those given by Grimm are 'to clear out, plunder' (a chest, purse; cf. to fake a cly), 'to torment, [illegible] treat'.]

1. a. trans. In thieves' or vagrants' language: To perform any operation upon; to 'do', 'do for'; to plunder, wound, kill; to do up, put into shape; to tamper with, for the purpose of deception. [late OE. fals adj. and sb., ad. L. fals-us false (neut. fals-um, used subst. in sense fraud, falsehood), orig. pa. pple. of fallĕre to deceive; cf. ON. fals sb. The adj. is found in OE. only in one doubtful instance (see sense 13); its frequent use begins in the 12th c., and was prob. due to a fresh adoption through the OF. fals, faus (mod.F. faux = Pr. fals, Sp., Pg., It. falso). The continental Teut. langs. adopted the word in an altered form: MHG. valsch. mod.G. falsch (cf. OHG. gifalscôn to falsify), OFris. falsch, Du. valsch, late Icel. (15th c.) falskr, Da., Sw. falsk.

The etymological sense of L. falsus is 'deceived, mistaken' (of persons), 'erroneous' (of opinions, etc.). The transition to the active sense 'deceitful' is shown in phrases like falsa fides 'breach of trust, faithlessness', where the sb. has a subjective and an objective sense. In mod.Eng. the sense 'mendacious' is so prominent that the word must often be avoided as discourteous in contexts where the etymological equivalent in other Teut. langs. or in Romanic would be quite unobjectionable. Some of the uses are adopted from Fr., and represent senses that never became English.]

falter ('fɔ:ltə(r), 'fɒltə(r)), v.[1] Forms: 5 faltir, 6 (in Fisher flalter, floghter), folter, 6–9 faulter, (7 foulter), 7 felter, 4- falter. [Of obscure etymology.

The current view, which connects the word with fault, is untenable, on the ground that falter has always been written with the l, and is so pronounced in the dialects in which it occurs, whereas in fault the l is an etymologizing insertion, which rarely occurs in spelling before 16th c., and was not pronounced, even by edueated speakers, till much later. (But it is not unlikely that association with fault may have coloured the recent use of the word.) It seems possible that sense 1, 'to stumble', may have been developed from the sense 'to be entangled' (FALTER v.[2]). On the other hand it is noteworthy that ME. falde-n, FOLD v. is used of the limbs and the tongue in the sense 'to give way, fail, falter'; perh. falter may be a frequentative of fald-en, formed irregularly through the influence of approximately synonymous vbs. like balter, totter, welter.]
